

The Commission's decisions on authorisation

An unknown territory that stakeholders should explore

The Commission makes the final decisions on the inclusion of substances in the authorisation list (REACH Annex XIV) and on subsequent industry applications for authorisation of Annex XIV-listed substances.

But what are the key stages and differences between the decision-making processes? For stakeholders, eager to influence these decisions, this is important to understand.

A complex system of checks and balances

Echa and its committees do not have the last word on REACH authorisation decisions. The agency makes recommendations on the inclusion of substances in REACH Annex XIV; Echa's Risk Assessment (Rac) and Socio-economic Analysis (Seac) committees form opinions on applications for authorisation. Those proposals addressed to the European Commission as the final decision maker, are non-binding.

At the same time, the decision-making powers of the Commission are limited and controlled by other bodies at the EU level – namely the REACH Committee, the European Parliament and the Council of the European Union – in the so-called ‘committee procedure’ (or comitology, as named in REACH Article 13(3)). Thus, decisions on REACH authorisation may well have a different outcome than initially proposed by Echa, its committees and even the Commission.

The draft decision
Already, at this stage, the influence of stakeholders may lead to a deviation from the Echa proposal. A recent example is the Commission note to the REACH Committee of 19 October 2015 on the 5th and 6th Echa Annex XIV recommendation, which considers that borates, nadimethylformamide (DMF) and dimeethylformamide (DMF) substances, recommending Annex XIV inclusion, have no such deadline for recommending Annex XIV substances,

The Commission decision on authorisation (simplified)

This draft decision is agreed by all responsible Commission Directories General (DG). For REACH, these are DG Environment and DG Internal Market, Industry, Entrepreneurship and SMEs.

This draft decision is agreed by all responsible Commission Directories General (DG). For REACH, these are DG Environment and DG Internal Market, Industry, Entrepreneurship and SMEs.

It is, therefore, important for industry and other stakeholders to participate in the Commission call for information on the socio-economic consequences of the authorisation requirement, which was run in parallel to Echa's public consultation on its draft Annex XIV recommendations in 2014 and 2015. The input provided is used by the Commission for its decision making on Annex XIV inclusion.

The REACH Committee opinion
The Commission needs to prepare a draft decision on authorisation applications (REACH Article 64(6)), within three months of receiving opinions from Echa. However, Echa has no such deadline for recommending Annex XIV substances, may, “at any time” during decision making, exercise their right of scrutiny. If they do so and oppose the proposal, the Commission shall review the draft decision, taking account of the positions expressed, and then inform the European Parliament and Council whether it intends to maintain, amend or withdraw it. This means that the Parliament and Council do not have a blocking right for the Commission decision on applications for authorisation, but they can force it to reassess its draft.

If the draft decision is opposed within the three months, the Commission shall not adopt it. It may submit to the REACH Committee an amended draft decision or present a legislative proposal. Therefore, the right of scrutiny for the two EU co-legislators gives them a blocking right – meaning the Commission is dependent on the support of the European Parliament and Council for its decisions on Annex XIV inclusions.

Experience gained, so far, has shown that the right of scrutiny is mainly of relevance for the European Parliament, because the Council consists of member state representatives, just like the REACH Committee.

By contrast, the EU Parliament is composed of representatives of the Union's citizens, who elect them directly. Members of the European Parliament exercise their mandate independently, and are not bound by any instructions (Rule 2 of the European Parliament Rules of Procedure).

The final Commission decision
If the Commission proposal has passed the REACH Committee and the scrutiny of European Parliament and Council as outlined above, the Commission shall adopt its draft decision.

The final decision is published in the Official Journal of the European Union as a Commission Regulation amending REACH Annex XIV and as a summary of the Commission decision on the authorisation application, respectively. The Commission keeps an up-to-date list of decisions on authorisation applications.

Draft decisions on Annex XIV listings
As you can see, it is worth stakeholders being acquainted with the Commission side of the authorisation decision-making process. Echa's proposals may well be overturned or amended. In each key step of the Commission's decision-making process – draft decision, REACH Committee opinion, right of scrutiny for the European Parliament and Council – affected stakeholders have the ability to influence decision makers and representatives at the EU and national level, to make sure that the final Commission decision complies both with the REACH legal requirements and their interests.

Major differences between the two decision procedures occur in relation to the role of the European Parliament and Council. In both cases, the two EU institutions have a so-called “right of scrutiny”, that is, they may indicate to the Commission that, in their view, the draft decision exceeds its implementing powers provided for in the REACH Regulation. However, the right of scrutiny has a different configuration.

Draft decisions on applications for authorisation

In case of draft decisions on applications for authorisation, where the REACH Committee delivers a positive opinion, the Commission shall in principle adopt them. The scrutiny by the European Parliament and Council is not a formal part of the examination procedure. However, they
